To James Lovett's views he was opposed ut-trely, in nothing did he agree with him; to the knife, and the fight would be a bitter one between these.

Although James Lovett was rich, he scon found money did not count for everything in an electionessing campaign. He was surprised to dissover that Harry Burney's eloquence, abilities, personal popularity, and still in debate, more than out-weighed his own money-bags. But what amazed him most was the influence old Tim Burney had in the constituency. He regarded Tim as a negligible quantity, he had a vote and a neglicible quantity; he had a vote and that was the extent of his political worth. He was quickly undeceived. If Harry Burney was popular, so was his tabler. The discovery was disagreeable. Lorent con-sidered to improve him but could not.
