The "Expert" swore that the waggon was too beavy for the donkeys loaded, I feel tempted to use a little Saxon word which might appear libellous so I refrain. Why was not the builder of the waggon called, or some practical man who knows what a waggon is? Empty, my little son of sir years old, is quite able to move it unaided. He further swore that one of the donkeys died further swore that one of the donkeys died. Twenty thousand spectators witnessed the France-Scottish rugby enatch. The referee was Easter of the English Rugby Union, and his penalising the Frenchmen constantly was the cause of his being bood and mobbed at the conclusion of the match. The troops surrounded the nosm and the referee who were saved from injury from the stakes and stones through the convent who were in-mobbing of the referee after the match though some criticism as to his decisions is made. The Press fear that it leave a bad impression upon their guests.

That exceptional importance and interest should attach to the issue of the present, 11th, edition of the Encyclo paedia Britannica is due to the recognition that the work is a new creation. too that the work is a new creation. It is founded, not upon previous editions, nor upon any existing publications; but upon a fresh survey of the world and its knowledge to day. It is "new," therefore, not only in the sense that its articles include the latest information, but also in the sense that, from beginning to end the point of view is new. In other words, not only are there new articles dealing with Radium for example, or with British East-Africa, or with Mr. Lloyd George, but equally new, also, are the articles dealing with a land to be been under discussion for centuries, such as Greek and Roman History, or Shakes peare, or music, or arithmetic

In the ordinary course, it would be supposed that a new edition of an enev clopaedia could be adequately made b sending the existing articles to the best living experts for revision not the method adopted in the present case, for two reasons. In the first place, it was recognised that all that could be done in the way of "bringing up to date" the existing articles of the 9th Edition (first issued 1875-89) had already been volumes issued by The Times The determination to make a fresh start again, was facilitated by a circumstance which is peculiar to the preparation of the present work. Whereas all extensive publications, including previous editions of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, have Had the old conditions prevailed, had it been decided to publish the present edition volume by volume, had the articles, in consequence, been written one after the other in their alphabetical order (with a lapse of 14 years, perhaps, order (with a lapse of 14 years, perhaps, as was the case in the 9th edition, between the writing of the articles "Africa" and "Zambesi"), the routine inevitably adopted would have been to send the existing articles, in their alpha betical order, for revision. The result would, doubtless have been a valuable But no new edition made in this way could have possessed the value which belongs to the present work. The result of the old method may be seen in the 9th edition, in which practically all the available geological information is contained in the one long treatise under the heading "Geology." There was not even a separate heading for "Volcano." The result of the new method may be seen in the 11th edition, where Sir Archibald Geikie gives the reader, in the article Geology, precisely what he would wish find in referring to such a general heading (namely a history of the science and an outline of its details are exhaustively treated in a series of some 500 other articles (ranging in scope from "Fault" and "Fold," Glacial Period" and "Silurian," down 'Granite' and 'Mica') ac cording to a plan drawn up by Woodward (late Assistant Director of the Geological Survey)

The "newness" of the new edition consists, then, not only in the fact that the work includes the most recent information upon a given subject, but also in the more fundamental circumstance that the subject is exhaustively treated in a convenient series of appropriate articles, written in execution of a new plan such as the present state of knowledge de

We are rather surprised to notice, despite the previous policy of the Municipal Com-mittee which did not permit of Indians creet-ing permanent buildings on River-road, that the buildings are hear creeted. The such buildings are being erected. The Municipality in their meetings have dwelt on the possible removal of the Bazaar Indians the possible removal of the Baraar Indians and others to a specific location and have thus only permitted temporary buildings in a most which is rapidly developing into an Oriental slum unless some early step is taken to place it in order.

In the course of its history, extend-ing over a period of nearly a century and a half, the Encyclopaedia Britannica passed into the keeping of no less than seven publishers. As if endowed with a life of its own, the book developed and prospered in the hands of each, outgrow ing the care of the individuals who, from time to time, enlisted themselves in its

"The Times" and the Britannica.

To none perhaps did it owe more than to the princely Constable, Sir Walter Scott's publisher, who issued the 5th and 6th editions When Constable's house stopped payment (Jan. 1826) the charge passed into the hands of Adam Black, who, in publishing the 7th and 8th editions saw the work reach a position pre-eminent in the world's literature Meanwhile, the cost of preparation had increased with each new edition, and it is moteworthy that doubting the expediency of the expenses projected in a projection with the 9th soltron. Valum Black himself withdrew from the enterprise which devolved upon his son

It may be doubted whether another edition upon the same scale would ever have been attempted, had not "The by its sale of a reprint of the 9th edition revealed how large a body of readers was ready for such a book if its rice could be brought within their reach Great as was the service performed by in this direction, it was scarcely for the publishers of a news paper to retain the permanent charge of a great educational work—the most comprehensive exhibition of scholarship in existence It was felt that the Encyclo-paedia Britannica should be established upon a more permanent basis, in keeping with its position as a national institu tion. In every respect such a work is the proper charge of a university, and in passing into the keeping of the University of Cambridge, the national work of reference will be regarded, by all who are acquainted with its record, as having found its natural abiding place.

The increasing need.

The development of the Encyclopaedia Britannica from the modest 3 volumes of the first edition (176s) to the 25 volumes of the present (11th) edition, is witness of the extent to which, with the growth of specialisation, the need of more urgent. It is no longer possible for a non- as a result of his education, expemence and ordinary reading, to acquire very small field of knowledge. Yet never was the practical value of information If the 29 volumes, the 44 million words, of the new edition are testimony to the amount there is to learn, they are also in themselves, an assurance of how much can be learned, with such assistance, by

The matter of its cheapness is one that the Syndies of the Cam bridge University Press desire should be most prominently put forward in connection with the new edition of the Encyclopaedia

Britannica, and for two reasons in the one hand, the sale of the new edition at the lowest possible price was regarded as an essential part of the responsibility undertaken by the University of Cambridge in assuming the copyright and control of a great admentional work. On the other hand, while the low subscription rate-fully meets this obligation, it does so with this limita-tion, that it applies only to those who order within a certain period and that but a short one. The temperary nature of a rate named with the avowed object of placing the new edition one named with the arrived object of pacing the new entition within reach of all, is evidently a consideration of the greatest practical importance, one as to which there should be left no £ 230,000 against Rs. 3-75.

Over $220,000 was expended merely in the preparation of the new edition, yet delivery of the cultre work may be secured for a payment of only Rs. 15, and the completion of his purchase lays no greater burden on the subscriber than a series of payments at the rate of Rs. 3-75 à week. The contrast between £230,000 and Rs 3.75 is sensational, but it fairly represents a day so wide that its adequate presentation calls for a book of over 40 million words and the collaboration of some 1,500 dis tinguished specialists, a book of this kind, to which reference

It may almost be said, indeed, that the costliness of its production is the measure of the extent to which such a work is needed and not least by men of moderate means. It would have availed little had this new edition perfected with all the resources of a vast scheme of organised scholarship gone forth from the Press of the University at such a price as to restrict the circle of its readers. If it is faithfully to achieve its purpose, it call for anything more than the courage of the conviction that a low price will be rewarded by large sales. At what might be called a standard price per volume, there were sold of the 9th edition about 10,0000 copies in 14 years. Of the present 30,000 copies within a few months. Since the cost of produc tion has been more than double, however, the increase in sales alone would not have justified so great a reduction in price for a minimum price there is needed also the other factor—the months instead of years. Thus the minimum price has already been withdrawn in the United Kingdom, and in inviting sub-

The photographs of the 1st and of the 11th editions here reproduced illustrate the immense expansion of knowledge which has taken place since 1768, and the corresponding growth of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. No other encyclopaedia -very few books indeed, of any kind, among such as are used solely for their in formation—can claim to have en oved so long a lease of useful life.

The 11th edition is so thoroughly up-to-date from beginning to end that no new edition will be called for or published until 1925 at the earliest

The growth of the Encyclopaedia Britannica is an indication of the ex-tent to which the need of such a work has increased with the growth of specialisation. If a book of this kind-was in demand 144 years ago, when a useful account of the arts and sciences could be given in 3 volumes, how much more is such a resource needed to day, when the required information occupies nearly ten times as many volumes? That the need is widely felt is shewn by the fact that the number of orders received within months of publication exceeded 30.000

11th edition (29 volumes, 1000 pages cash, the work of 1500 specialists, 10,000 illustrations) printed in 2 forms-

The date at which the Encyclopaedia Britannica made its first appearance is not without significance. It has been said of Goethe that his was the last mind capable of taking all knowledge for its province. The Encyclopaedia Britannica came into being when Goethe was in his twentieth year a fruit of the general intellectual ferment which in France intellectual ferment which in France brought forth the great Encyclopedic and prepared the way for the Revolution. Specialisation, which was alregdy ex-tending the sciences beyond the reach of a single mind, was destined to effect, during the following century, such a rapid expansion of knowledge as the first publisher could never have conceived. Britannica was called for, each new issue shewing by its increase over its predecessor the increase in all there was to

And, with the growth of the book itself, the need of such a resource has grown more and more evident. The illustrations reproduced in the centre of this page may thus be taken to represent not only the growth of knowledge during the past century and a half, but also the structive encyclopaedia has grown with the multiplication of special studies. The matter as did its first predecessor, and is ten times as much needed. Its more than 40 million words suggest, not only how much there is to learn, but also how much can be learned with the assistance

A NEED OF THE DAY.

Were it still possible for a man to acquire-from his own experience, from his intercourse with others, from the ordinary course of his reading-even a passing acquaintance with the sciences. arts and industries, with the history and geography of the world, with its beliefs speculations and laws, the need of an encyclopaedia would not be felt.

IN YOUR PROFESSION.

The most " practical " of men recog The most plactical of metal-on-nises to-day the advantage of supplement-ing from outside sources the knowledge he has acquired by his individual experi-posit of view, the new ence. From this point of view, the new edition has been welcomed as invaluable by technical journais and experts in every variety of profession. As the "Law Journal recommends the work to lawyers, on account of its legal articles. British Medical Journal" finds that the medical articles will render the new edition of special service to doctors. The Dean of the Faculty of Commerce In litmingham concluded a review of the industrial articles by declaring that, on their account the new edition should find its place "on the shelves of every manager of big works in the English speaking In the same strain a reviewer of the engineering articles described the new edition as being " as much the stock-in trade of the engineer as his goods are to a grocer," while purchasers engaged in farming have particularly commented upon the usefulness of the agricultural

It says much for the authoritative and exhaustive character of its articles that a work which deals with all-knowledge, and is intended for all readers should thus be welcomed as a valuable asset even by specialists in professions well provided with their own special technical literature. But, while many a subscriber has first been attracted to the new edition on account of the articles dealing with his special subject, its great attraction undoubtedly lies precisely in the fact that it treats of all subjects.

A COMPLETE EQUIPMENT.

The reader may take little interest in ausic or architecture, he may never have looked upon a plant or a rock as a subject of possible interest; he may have dismissed the history of Rome, along with other incomprehensible things, on his departs of the company of the com parture from school, and may never have dreamed of attacking that of the United States. But the value of the new Encyclopaedia Britannica would be infinitely less in his eyes, if it neglected any even among the subjects most unfamiliar to him, I may not be conscious at the moment, he argues, of wishing to know about any of these things: but 1 would not be without the means of knowing, if such be offered to me. The mere session of such a resource gives me a feeling of security

IN BRITISH EAST AFRICA & UGANDA AT THE MINIMUM LONDON RATE.

Since the new Encyclopaech Britan-nica is a work which rightly appeals as an invaluable resource to intelligent.

readers of every class, the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press regarded # as part of their responsibility that this great educational work should be offered at a price so low, and upon such easy terms of payment as to place it within the reach of the largest possible public. In advance of publication, therefore, appli-cations were invited in England and America at the minimum price of 15s 10d a volume (payable 21s. monthly) against 30s. a volume, the price at which the 9th edition was published. When it The Blue Posts Hotel is remembered that the ordinary biography or book of travel, published at 21s., contains 300,000 words at most, and a volume of the new Encyclopaedia Britannica contains a million and a half words, the cheapness of the work at the
