What makes DIRTY ENGINES?

External dirt is usually due to neglect, and it is surprising how a slight oil or water leak can turn a beautiful mechanism into an eyescen. Such leaks can usually be remedied with a serwedriver or a spanner, and it is remembiable how often the will cure an engine's tendency to gobble up of, boil at the slightest provocation. Internal dirt is also generally caused by oil, water, or both.

DIRT BY OIL.

DIRT BY OIL.

Carbon on the valves, pistons, or epinder hads is almost wholly the product of the lubricating oil, and although research has shown that only about 10 per cent. of the oil used by as engine is turned into curbon deposition on such parts it is astonishing what an enormous deposit on collect in a short time if the wrong sort of oil is used.

Engines var, much in their susceptibility to oil nature, their internal tempera-tures vary also, as do the design of the parts, and the methods used for supplying oil to them.

The oil enginer has to analyse evergetype of engine made and prescribe a grade of oil suited to each, and if the eventual owner does not shide by the expert's decision be may expect trouble, and will usually get it in the shape of earbon, dirt, and stock pieton rings.

A dirty engine may be due to over-enthusiasm on the part of the owner in maintaining the crankease oil level, maybe the oil pressure is adjusted too highly, possibly the pistons and rings fit the cylinders bodly, or else the bearings are loose.

In these cases too much oil gets to the cylinder heads: the same thing may occur if too light an oil is used. DIDT BY WATER dirty crankone is generally due to the ingress of water, or excessive dilution the oil by poor petrol, or by an improperly adjusted earburetter.

All the time the oil is in use minute particles of carbon are forming in B on account of its contact with the hot engine partie, normally these carbon particles remain in suspension and are harmless; water, however, congulated and deposits them, producing greaty sludge which befouls the motor, clogs the filters, and obstructs the oil—ways.
