veys and Plans Promptly Executed

The white settler of Equatoria has never shown a very kind repard for the Indian, and some very unkind things have been said of the sons of Hindissian. A good many of them are true. It is not surprising that there is an agitatign against them, because after all they are largely drawn from the seum of India's teening militons. The secum of India's teeming millions. The white settler, however, might be interested to read an Indian expression of opinion of the European, but more especially of an always an interesting little journal, said on

The number of uneducated men in India is overwhelmingly greater than the educated, and the opinion these uni-educated men have regarding Englishmen is not at all flattering to the vanity of our rulers. The Hindoos are conservative, and perhaps more conservative than any other nation in the world, and the notions of propriety, their manners and customs, are at such complete variance with those of the Europeans, that at most everything they see in the latter, creates in them a feeling of disgust and
