MORRIS Minor

The Minor undoubtedly goes a great deal for a very little and is as refreshing in these days of high costs that it can be worth while on occasion to take on a single gallon of petrol, in the knowledge that this will carry up to four people at thirty 30 miles, and over 40 miles according to the needs used, and the nature of the route involved.

WHO ARE THESE KOREANS?

MADLEINE MUNDAY, who spent a considerable time in the peninsula of Korea, writes of the Koreans, their history and what they themselves feel about the war which has shattered their land.

It is scarcely surprising that the man in the street knows little about Korea. Not only because it is an unenviable land, but because, from 1950, it has been a sleepy country of Japan and may a comparatively small number of Europeans, returned from the East.

To a casual observer a Korean looks rather like a cross between a Chinese and a Japanese. He is tall and slender, with a high forehead and a thin nose. He is dressed in the loose-fitting robes which are the traditional dress of the East. He is a friendly and cheerful man, and he is a good talker. He is a man who is proud of his country and who is determined to see it free and independent.

Through these few lines it is possible to get a glimpse of the life of the Korean people. It is a life of hardship and struggle, but it is also a life of hope and determination. The Korean people are a brave and resilient people, and they are determined to see their country free and independent.

The Chinese when Communism came to power in 1949, they probably felt that they were the only ones who were not yet free. They were a people who had been oppressed for centuries, and they were determined to see their country free and independent.
