"Spare The Rod . . . ?"

On Punishing Children I hear . . .

A STANDARD reporter interviewed several people on the subject of whether children should be punished either by a parent or otherwise for their misdeeds, and amongst the ideas that were put forward were an opinion of a child psychologist and the mother of a child who only give you these two views.

When the mother seemed to think that the child should be punished, she said she was not sure of her own mind, but she was sure that the child should be punished. She said she was not sure of her own mind, but she was sure that the child should be punished.

I hear . . .

Many of our people think that the child should be punished. They think that the child should be punished. They think that the child should be punished.

STRANGER IN KENYA

by Elsa M. Sanders

THE first to think that struck me as the ship nosed its way up the creek to Kilindi was the brilliance of light and colour, the pink jades of the sea against the tropical foliage of the coast, the occasional stretches of gleaming sand.

Here there was a sense of space and freedom. The expanse of the bay was not interrupted by the high, craggy of the Indian Ocean. The sea was not a barrier, it was a friend. It was a friend that had been waiting for me, that had been waiting for me.

The first to think that struck me as the ship nosed its way up the creek to Kilindi was the brilliance of light and colour, the pink jades of the sea against the tropical foliage of the coast, the occasional stretches of gleaming sand.
