

ABSTRACT

This paper examines the notion of cultural universals and then seeks to identify what the author wishes to identify as “cultural fundamentals” in philosophy and philosophical debate. The paper then assesses the extent to which such fundamentals are obstacles to the “birth” of potential philosophers. Lastly I suggest a solution to this problem.